Brokers Cut Some Links To Barclays

By BRADLEY HOPE

Major brokers are shutting down their connections to a dark pool run by Barclays PLC following accusations of fraud against the bank in a lawsuit filed Wednesday by the New York attorney general, according to people familiar with the matter.

Broker-dealers including Deutsche Bank AG, Royal Bank of Canada and ITG have removed connections to the dark pool, called Barclays LX, from their routing systems, the people said. In some cases, the decision was a precautionary measure after the lawsuit was filed and in others it was the result of requests from large institutional investors, they said.

Brokers have been receiving calls from investors since the complaint against Barclays was made public Wednesday afternoon, said David Mechner, chief executive of Pragma Securities LLC, which sells computer models to brokers and investors to help them trade stocks.

"We have had a lot of requests to turn them off," he said of Barclays LX.

Barclays was accused of lying to customers about how it favors high-frequency traders in its dark pool, according to the lawsuit filed by New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman.

The lawsuit sent the bank's shares down 6.5% on Thursday and raised new questions about its chief executive's efforts to rebuild his institution's image.

In a memo sent to Barclays staff Thursday afternoon, CEO Antony Jenkins expressed his "deep disappointment and frustration that our business is back in the news this week for the wrong reasons."

Mr. Jenkins said the bank is conducting an internal investigation and has brought in "substantial external resources" to assist with that effort.

Google Acts on 'Forgotten' Rule

By SAM SCHEGNER

The Internet is starting to forget.

Google Inc. on Thursday started removing results from its search engine under Europe's new "right to be forgotten," implementing a landmark May ruling by the European Union's top court that gives individuals the right to request removal of results that turn up in Internet searches for their own names.

Google engineers overnight updated the company's technical infrastructure to begin implementing the removals, and Thursday began sending the first emails to individuals informing them that links they had requested were being taken down. The company has hired a dedicated "removals team" to evaluate each request, though only a small number of the initial wave of takedown requests has so far been processed.

"This week, we're starting to take action on the removal requests that we've received," a Google spokesman

"This is a new process for us. Each request has to be assessed individually, and we're working as quickly as possible to get through the queue."

Google's fast move to accommodate a wave of takedown requests represents the Please turn to page 5

Experts denounce Gove proposal to outsource children's protection to private firms

The Guardian 17五月 2014 Patrick Butler
Social policy editor

The power to take children away from their families could be privatised along with other child protection services under controversial plans the government has quietly announced.

The proposal from Michael Gove's Department for Education (DFE) to permit the outsourcing of children's social services in England to companies such as G4S and Serco has alarmed experts. They say profit-making companies should not be in charge of such sensitive family matters, and warn that the introduction of the profit motive into child protection may distort the decision-making process.

A DFE consultation paper published last month argues that enabling local authorities to outsource children's social s →

The MOE has attributed the decline to the facts that more and more university graduates have been pursuing master's or doctoral degrees at local academic institutes rather than overseas, while there has also been a decline in the number of U.S. scholarships available for Taiwanese st →

China detains journalist, reason unclear

Foreign media workers Wednesday expressed alarm at Beijing's detention of a Chinese employee with a Japanese newspaper, the latest in a series of arrests before the 25th anniversary of the Tiananmen crackdown.

The Foreign Correspondents' Club of China said it was "alarmed and deeply concerned" by reports of the detention of Xin Jian, which "raise the disturbing possibility that she is being punished for the routine discharge of her professional duty on behalf of her employer." "The FCCC calls on the authorities to present evidence that Ms. Xin has broken the law or, in the absence of such evidence, to release her immediately," it said in a statement.

Xin, an assistant for Japan's Nikkei newspaper working in the southwestern megacity of Chongqing, was taken away from her home by police on May 13, the paper said earlier.

She was detained on suspicion of "picking quarrels and provoking troubles," the paper said, citing a detention notice given by police to Xin's family on Monday.

The vague charge has been increasingly abused by the ruling Communist Party to round up dissenters, journalists and others it sees as a challenge to one-party rule,
